Endangered Species

A Small populations of the plant- eating marine species dugong (Dugong Dugon) with flipper-like forelimbs, are found exclusively off the coast of Sabah and they are seriously in decline.

B Once widespread throughout mainland Southeast Asia, the Sumatran rhinoceros (Dicerorhinus sumatrensis) is now a very rare sight. The largest herbivore that lives exclusively in the tropical rainforest, each animal needs at least 10 square kilometres to roam in, thus, a large area of undisturbed forest is required for a healthy population to have any chance of survival.

C Exclusively a forest dweller, the clouded leopard (Neofelis nebulosa) feeds on squirrels, birds and monkeys, including young orang utan which are themselves a protected species. Its survival is seriously threatened. Only very few recent sightings have been made in isolated forests.

D In 1992, 113 Asian elephant herds (Elephas maximus), totalling 1,000 animals, existed on the Peninsula. The clearing of lowland forest for agricultural use has fragmented habitats and elephant populations. As a result, the amount of food and cover will diminish and the chances of breeding will be reduced.

E Found in lowland forest, tree -lined swamps and riverine habitats of Sabah and Sarawak, the Storm's stork (Ciconia stormi) is now a rare resident, totalling fewer than 200 individuals.

F Malaysia's national animal, a prancing pair of which adorn the country's crest, is now under threat. The Malayan tiger was long considered a livestock-preying pest but, because of the large-scale clearance of lowland forest, which also supports the greatest proportion of the animal's prey – wild boar and sambar deer – and more recently the demand for tiger products in Chinese medicine, the tiger population has been in serious decline since the 1960s.
