The world watched closely as Dr Elena Volkov prepared for a historic mission at the International Space Research Centre in Kazakhstan. News reporters gathered outside the massive building while engineers rushed through the corridor carrying tablets and files. Scientists in the control room carefully checked every system before launch. Elena, calm and focused, stood beside the spaceship Aurora 1, ready to lead one of the most important scientific missions ever carried out beyond Earth's atmosphere. The mission would last four days and collect important information about life and survival in deep space.

Elena was born in a small town in northern Russia. Her mother worked as a nurse while her father sold tickets at a railway station. Every evening, she sat near her bedroom window with an old telescope that once belonged to her grandfather to study the stars. Although her family struggled financially, her parents always encouraged her love for science and learning. They would even accompany her at the local library for hours on weekends to read on space.

At school, Elena displayed strong potential in Physics and Mathematics and her teachers noticed her ability in problem-solving. But high school was not always easy: friendship was a challenge because it was hard for her to find people who shared the same interests. Mr Abraham, her class teacher, asked her to lead the school team at a science fair, she jumped at it. Through the experience, she was able to improve her communication skills and made new friends.

After finishing school, Elena entered a leading university in Moscow to study space engineering. In her final year, Elena joined a national research competition for young scientists. Teams from across the country presented their ideas for future space technology. Elena impressed the judges with her confidence and wide knowledge of the subject. Her group did not win, but Elena was offered an opportunity to join a special training programme at the International Space Research Centre.

A Hard Lesson in Saving

Last year, I received a generous amount of 'duit raya' – money packets, from my relatives. Being a teenager, my first instinct was to head straight to the mall. I had been eyeing a pair of limited-edition sneakers for months.

Even though they cost almost all of my savings, I felt I deserved a reward for my exam results. 27 [ ] However, the excitement did not last long. A week later, my school announced a much-anticipated graduation trip to Langkawi. All my close friends were signing up immediately. When I checked my bank account, I realised I only had fifty ringgit left. 28 [ ] There was a deep sense of regret as I stared at my expensive sneakers, which now seemed far less important.

I tried asking my parents for an advance on my allowance. My father, however, saw this as a 'teachable moment'. He explained that financial independence requires discipline and planning. 29 [ ] He told me that if I wanted to go on the trip, I would have to earn the money myself.

I decided to take up a part-time job at a local bakery on the weekends. It was exhausting work, standing for hours and serving demanding customers. 30 [ ] I started to understand the true value of every ringgit I earned. I stopped buying expensive bubble tea and began packing my own lunch for school.

Slowly, my savings began to grow. I tracked every expense in a small notebook to ensure I was staying within my budget. 31 [ ] By the end of the month, I had finally saved enough for the trip deposit. It was a proud moment when I handed the cash to my teacher.

In the end, I made it to Langkawi. The trip was amazing, but the lesson I learned was even more valuable. I realised that being a smart consumer isn't about how much you have, but how you manage it. 32 [ ]

Now, I always think twice before making a big purchase.
