HELP THAT MATTERS

Many single mothers raise their children while working and taking care of the home by themselves. Help should make their lives easier, not make them feel weak. People can buy from their small businesses, share job news, look after their children when needed or give school items. Local groups can teach simple work skills so they can earn more money. When single mothers get kind and useful help, their children can have better food, school things and a safer feeling at home. This help gives hope.

3 According to the text, how can people support single mothers?

A By hiring them to do simple work skills.

B By providing financial support and school materials.

C By supporting their work and helping them care for their families.

A frog begins life as a tiny egg in water. After a few days, the egg hatches into a tadpole. At first, the tadpole has a tail and breathes through gills. As it grows, back legs appear, followed by front legs. Its lungs develop, and its tail slowly becomes shorter. The young frog then leaves the water more often but still stays near damp places. When it becomes an adult, it can return to the water to lay eggs and begin the cycle again.

4 Which of the following is TRUE about a frog's life cycle?

A A tadpole grows front legs before its back legs appear.

B A tadpole breathes through gills before its lungs develop.

C A young frog lays eggs after leaving the water more often.

Book Review

The Time Traveller's Secret

The Time Traveller's Secret is about a teenage girl named Yuhaniz. One day, she finds an old watch in her grandmother's storeroom. The watch can take her to the past. During her journeys, Yuhaniz learns that her family has looked after the watch for many years. She also faces problems and finds out more about her family history. The story is exciting because each trip teaches her something new. Readers can follow Yuhaniz as she becomes braver and more careful.

5 From the review, what will readers discover in the book?

A The watch stayed in Yuhaniz's family for generations.

B Time-travelling taught Yuhaniz about her problematic family.

C Her grandmother kept the watch to help Yuhaniz learn family history.

The Light by the Lake

When my father told us that he had been promoted, everyone looked proud. He smiled, but I could not. His new job meant that our family had to leave the city and move to a small town where evenings were too quiet. I was sixteen, and moving was not my thing.

On my first day at school, I felt as if everyone knew me. Students looked at me before I introduced myself. Some smiled, while others whispered my name. A small town, I thought, did not need the Internet because stories spread like wildfire. While looking for my classroom, I saw a boy near a noticeboard. He placed a cream-coloured card in my hand.

The boy was about my age, with neat hair, pale skin and an old shirt buttoned to the neck. His name was James. His smile was gentle, but his eyes looked lonely. On the card were only an address and the words, "Come when the sun is low." That evening, my mother thought it was a kind welcome, while my father reminded me to stay alert.

The next day, I forced myself to be brave and followed the address. Soon, I reached a lake that reflected the orange sky. Beside it stood a beautiful house from an old storybook. Its cream walls glowed, golden lamps shone through tall windows, and white flowers climbed along the balcony.

At the front door, a butler in a dark suit welcomed me. James was waiting inside. His hand felt cold, but his voice was warm. The hall smelled of roses and wood. Guests moved quietly around the room. Nobody looked at a phone or asked why I had come alone.

James stayed near me most of the evening. He asked about my old school, my family and whether I missed the city. He listened carefully, but sometimes stared at the lake as if waiting for someone. Before I left, the butler handed me heavy paper bags, so I imagined expensive gifts inside.

At home, my excitement turned sour. The boxes were filled with dry leaves, black stones and burnt wood. My mother turned pale, and my father threw everything away. The next morning, I told Elise, my classmate. She did not laugh and brought me to her house after school.

Elise's mother froze when she saw the card. She had received the invitation years earlier, but had been too frightened to go. Elise's father, whose family had lived there for generations, told us about the rich family who owned the house by the lake and welcomed newcomers with parties.
